IN THIS ISSUE / FOOD & CITY

Three measures of time meet in this edition: diplomacy unfolding in Tehran, a pioneering film returning to the screen, and a Persian restaurant that has endured in New York for more than three decades. The cover photograph is from Persepolis, one of eleven businesses in our directory.

IRAN & THE WORLD

Tehran talks seek a path away from escalation

Reuters reported October 26 that senior Saudi, Pakistani and Turkish officials would meet Iranian leaders in Tehran on regional security. No outcome had been announced.

Brooklyn dining and the kitchens behind a celebration

Prospect Heights

Sofreh

At Sofreh, Nasim Alikhani’s restaurant on Saint Marks Avenue, Persian hospitality meets Brooklyn city life. Its official reservation page releases tables for up to six people online four weeks ahead at midnight. Dinner is listed Tuesday through Sunday, 5:30 to 9:30 p.m.; Monday is closed. Read the cancellation and party size conditions before booking.

On Bogart Street, Eyval belongs to a newer chapter of Persian dining in Brooklyn. Chef Ali Saboor, previously of Sofreh, approaches Iranian culinary traditions through a contemporary restaurant setting. The official Eat and Drink pages are the best starting point for its current offering. This is a researched introduction, rather than a review based on an anonymous meal.

FROM THE EDITOR

The city we make together

A local publication must balance urgency with endurance. The Tehran meeting may change by the hour, BAM’s screenings have fixed dates, and a restaurant’s history is measured in decades. We place all three together with precise language, clear dates and links to the underlying sources.

OUR METHOD & SOURCES

Text is prepared using the linked sources. Introductions are not reviews based on personal visits. Photos come from official business websites and remain their owners’ property. This week’s sources were checked October 26, 2026; individual listing dates appear on our website. Please confirm hours and reservations before visiting.
